Memory specificity in the preschool classroom. When preschool-age children learn two sets of materials, are they able to generalize their learning? To determine whether preschool children are able to develop memory specific learning, we used a group-learning, multiple-trial paradigm in which in each trial, children were presented with two sets of simple symbols and were asked to memorize one set. Following this, children were tested by a multiple-trial learning paradigm in which they studied the other set of symbols and were asked to discriminate novel and familiar symbols. We found that preschool children were able to develop memory specific learning in this group-learning multiple-trial paradigm, but not in a single-trial test of multiple-trial multiple
